For over thirty years, the Southern Oral History Program has recorded the voices of the past. UNC students and faculty have interviewed more than 3000 Southerners—from to mill workers to civil rights leaders to a future president of the United States. Made available to the public through UNC's renowned Southern Historical Collection, these priceless tapes and transcripts capture the vivid personalities, poignant personal stories, and behind-the-scenes decision-making that bring history to life. The SOHP has gained national recognition for:

- Creating an unparalleled archives of sound recordings that document life in the twentieth century South.
- Attracting exceptional students to the University, providing them with hands-on research opportunities, and teaching them to combine scholarship with public service. Our award-winning graduates now direct oral history programs and teach southern history throughout the country.
- Making history accessible through community-based workshops and collaborations with the public schools, with an emphasis on understanding the roots of current issues and building bridges between generations and between the university and the public.
- Producing prize-winning publications and documentaries that offer a fresh understanding of the modern South.
